He is also extremely quick and able. He worked well and is on course to do very well in the subject. He has occasionally made poor choices in how to go about answering questions, and may yet mess up, but I predict a clear distinction.

Nearly all of his problem sets are written very beautifully and this answers show attention to detail. He is very proactive in the tutorials and is very energetic. He also has strong economic intuition - he already thinks like an Economist. I see great potential Zhenghong to obtain a First in the exams.

He was understandably very busy (preparing for his thesis in Pol. Soc.) and did not spend as much time on micro as I would have liked him to. That said, it was apparent in the tutes that he has a good grasp of most of the material. If he gives himself enough time to revise, he should do well. Just remember one thing: understanding the material is one thing. Knowing what is being asked and knowing how to respond to (exam) questions well is another. Please look at past exams and specimen papers. Practice on those. Get feedback from grad mentors. He is very creative on the essay writing front. That sometimes works really well, but it can also sometimes work against him if his approach happens to be too complicated (or possibly wrong). E.g. I'm thinking of the insurance market essay in which he attempted an analytical solution to the problem -- but it would have been much easier to approach it graphically.

His coverage and understanding of the materials, his committed attitude, his constant improvement on the econometric side of the paper, and the quality of his written work were First class. ZhengHong is planning to write a thesis on quantitative political science topic, so the effort he made in Pol Soc will be very helpful later on. Two things concern me, though, at this point. First, the level of nuance and sophistication that ZhengHong is able to show in his tutorial essays will be difficult to replicate in an exam setting. He will need to practice exam writing under timed conditions (at home and in Collections), and learn how to be more selective in his arguments and critical engagement with the literature. Second, I hear from Economics that the extra effort he put in Pol Soc came at the cost of investing in Microeconomics. Zhenghong should remember that all papers need to be mastered in order to get a First, and that, as he very well knows, technical papers are not necessarily always the most straightforward.
